ABSTRACT

The problem of the use of illegally obtained evidence in civil procedure is both old and interesting. The practical and theoretical issues raised by the phenomenon of acquiring and presenting evidence before the court, which is obtained through the breach of substantive law are significant. Moreover, the main issue is how to deal with the case where the illegally obtained evidence is the only material to provide grounds for justification of the court's decision. The current paper examines this issue, particularly as regards infringements of the European and the Greek legislation protecting the individuality and confidentiality of communications, which takes place on the Internet.
